The past decade has witnessed disasters on a scale of human suffering and economic costs that have served to alert scientists and public officials alike of the challenges that lay ahead in the management of risk. We need a better understanding of how emotion, perceived risk, and risk-related behavior emerge amidst a crisis and then decay. Diverse hazards and methodological approaches are addressed in this collection of articles.